

Announcement of JSGS Internship with Heritage Saskatchewan

Heritage Saskatchewan is expanding our partnership with the Johnson Shoyama Graduate School of Public Policy (JSGS) this summer. Two graduate students, Gureech Mabior and Angelique Musengimana Sugira, will join our team for the month of August. They will be involved in a research project that takes a holistic approach to sustainable community development. Understanding Living Heritage is essential to the success of sustainable community development projects and considering the cultural, social and environmental aspects of development will reveal economic opportunities that enable communities to think globally and act locally. The results of this research will inform policy development and provide a framework with measurable indicators to ensure people are at the heart of community development in Saskatchewan.
